It is in this phase of the work that water--atmospheric, terrestrial and oceanic--is considered. Each is considered by itself, then reviewed in its relations to the atmosphere and the lithosphere. (d) Summary. Here the whole field is reviewed and its highest significance--its relation to the earth as the abode of man is sought. GEOLOGY. The course in Geology consists of class-room and field work; laboratory work in mineralogy, lithology, and the study and classification of fossils. The class-room work involves recitations and discussions based upon topics assigned to the class, and the presentation of special topics by students. The general subject is considered under the following heads: First.--Dynamic Geology; treating of the causes of the earth s changes and climatic variations including the forces at work in making rocks, soils, mountains, continents, oceans, basins, etc. Second.--Structural Geology; treating of...
