From its balsam-clad breast ripple countless rills of pure water, and from the dense laurel at its base rushes a crystal stream, which - wrestling with gnarled tree-trunks, and granite boulders, and leaping precipices, and bursting through rocky barriers - falls among the foot-hills, and, gathering volume in its course through fertile valleys, sweeps, a mighty river, to the sea. Projected in grand proportions upon the morning horizon of our history are the forms of the great and good men, from whose lofty minds and pure hearts flowed the educational influences which, gathering force and conquering all obstacles, swelled into the great stream of this University, which bears those who embark upon it to another boundless sea. How can we pay them adequate tribute? Was not...
