And now, I entreat you, sir, to grant me my liberty, and suffer me to return where I alone can be happy, to my dear native village; to my home; and my dearest Mr. Brown. Having sealed this letter, and directed it to captain H. Montague, she delivered it to Giles, and desired him immediately to forward it. Giles took the letter; but was greatly embarrassed, not knowing how to dispose of it, or in what part of America captain Montague resided. He consulted, upon the occasion, his wife and Betty, who both advised him to forward it to Mr. Stanly. He followed their advice, and sent it to L, enclosed in one to that gentleman, just after he had removed to Philadelphia. It was entrusted to careless hands to be conveyed from thence, and finally lost without ever reaching him. Dorcasina waited impatiently, a long time, for an answer; but none arriving, she became still more unhappy; and there is no calculating how far her despair would have carried her, had not a new acquaintance, which she contracted about this time, turned her thoughts into a new channel, and given her a set of new feelings. The township, where she now resided, was large and thinly inhabited, and the farm of Mr. Stanly was situated in a remote corner. At the distance of five miles was a meeting-house, near which were the parsonage, and a public school house. About the time that...
